Design by Mitch O'Connell

For centuries tattoos have been used to identify, mark, map, and beautify the body, and today remain a popular means of artistic and personal expression. In Africa, body scarification and tattooing affirms ethnic identity, social status within community, and the permanent transition into adulthood. Meditations on African Art: Pattern, on view until August 17, explores the relationship between patterns and the human body through intricately decorated figurative sculptures. The exhibition will be open during the event.

Talk – 7 p.m.

Join Bob Baxter, Editor-in-Chief of Skin & Ink magazine, for a discussion on the popularity of tattoos in mainstream culture. Advance tickets are highly recommended. Baxter is joined by some of the most renowned names in the tattoo world:

Kip Fulbeck (Santa Barbara) author of Permanence: Tattoo Portraits by Kip Fulbeck and Professor of Art at University of California, Santa Barbara

Jacci Gresham (New Orleans) first female African-American tattoo artist

Mitch O'Connell (Chicago) author of Mitch O'Connell: Tattoos and acclaimed flash artist

Lyle Tuttle (San Francisco) forefather of modern tattooing and legendary tattoo artist

Zulu (Los Angeles) tattoo artist for celebrities such as Janet Jackson and Christina Aguilera

MEDITATIONS ON AFRICAN ART: PATTERN

March 12 – August 17, 2008

Free exhibition

The third and final installation in the BMA's Meditations on African Art series, Pattern features more than 70 diverse works—many on view for the first time—that define the shape and surface of African art. Dramatic textiles, fragile adinkra dye stamps, delicately carved ivories, boldly painted shields, and figurative works show the role of pattern in cultural style, body adornment, and dynamic visual design. Nigerian-born, London-based artist Mary Evans has created several site-specific works for the exhibition, including video montages detailing the slave trade in British port cities, West Africa, and on plantations in the southern U.S. that are viewed through a kaleidoscope; floor-to-ceiling intricately patterned murals; and framed works on paper. She has also created a series of rosettes for the windows above the BMA's Visitors Entrance.

This exhibition is curated by Karen Milbourne, BMA Associate Curator of the Arts of Africa.

The Meditations series is generously sponsored by Polk Audio, Matthew Polk and Amy Gould.
